George Frideric Handel (1685 - 1759)

Perhaps the single word that best describes the life of George Frideric Handel is 'cosmopolitan'. He was a German composer, trained in Italy, who spent most of his life in England.

Handel was born in the city of Halle, in Saxony, the son of a barber-surgeon. As a boy he showed an exceptional talent for music, receiving, from a local organist, the only formal musical instruction he would ever have. At the age of 17 became the organist at Halle Cathedral. He was not encouraged by his father to take up a career in music, so entered the university to study law. But within a year, Handel had set out for Hamburg, two hundred miles away. There, he took a post as violinist in the Hamburg opera orchestra. In 1704, he composed his own first opera, Almira, which achieved great success. After three years in Hamburg, Handel accepted invitations to work in Italy, the birthplace of operatic style. His first stop was Florence. From there he travelled to Rome, where he enjoyed the patronage of both the nobility and the clergy. He refined and developed his skills not only in opera but also in oratorio, cantata, and sacred music, as well as instrumental forms. He ended his time in Italy with the spectacular success of his fifth opera Agrippa (1709), in Venice.

On his return to Germany, in 1710, he accepted the position of director of music to the Elector of Hanover. He took leave of absence to try his fortune in London, introducing himself successfully to English audiences with his opera Rinaldo (1711). After returning to Hanover he was granted permission for a second, short trip to London, from which he never returned. Three years later, his Elector became King George I of England. Whatever George I thought about Handel's prolonged absences from his post in Hanover, reconciliation must have taken place, because the King lent his support, in 1719, to the formation of a Royal Academy of Music to establish Italian opera in London. During the next ten years London became the operatic centre of Europe, attracting many foreign artists. Handel, himself, wrote more than thirty operas for the London stage and devoted himself to the promotion of opera at the King's Theatre, Haymarket.

Attempting to satisfy the fickle taste of the fashionable London world with Italian opera that most people could not understand was difficult and his success varied. The Royal Academy of Music came to an end in 1728, and by 1737 both the opera houses that Handel was involved with, had closed in financial ruin.

During the 1730's Handel began turning his attention to composing English dramatic oratorios and producing more instrumental music used in conjunction with the oratorios. Written in the vernacular, the oratorio was much more accessible to the rapidly growing middle classes. In 1735, Handel conducted 15 oratorio concerts in London. Despite a stroke in 1737, in the next five years he produced the oratorios Saul (1739), Israel in Egypt (1739) and Messiah (1742). Handel continued composing oratorios at the rate of about two a year until 1751, when his eyesight began to fail. In 1750 Handel became involved with a charity set up by the philanthropic sea captain Thomas Coram 'for exposed and deserted young children'. He directed a performance of Messiah for the Foundling Hospital, which was a great success and which became an annual event continuing until Handel's death and beyond.

He had become an English citizen in 1727, anglicising his name as above, and acquiring a house in Brook Street, Mayfair, where he lived until the end of his life. Now the Handel House Museum, the building has been restored to look as it did during Handel's 36 year occupancy and hosts a lively events programme.

On his death in London on April 14 1759, Handel was regarded as the greatest composer of his day. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. Behind the corpulent, rather sombre figure that had towered over the musical scene in the 18th century, there was, according to the musical historian Dr Burney, a smile, 'bursting out of a black cloud ... a sudden flash of intelligence, wit and good humour, beaming in his countenance, which I hardly ever saw in any other'.

Messiah

When Handel began putting Messiah down on paper in 1741, the 56 year-old composer, despite his amazing energy, was showing signs of wear. He had already suffered a stroke and had only recently emerged from a period of depression that had plagued him during the 1730's. Handel had spent his entire career producing operas, oratorios and chamber music at lightning speed. Nevertheless the twenty-four days it took him to compose Messiah remains a miracle of musical creation.

The texts were selected by Charles Jennens (1700-1773), who was a literary scholar and an editor of the plays of Shakespeare. They encapsulate the central beliefs of Christianity, from the Old Testament prophecies of the coming of the Messiah through to the Nativity and crucifixion of Jesus, the Resurrection and Ascension, and the belief in final victory over sin, death and decay. So although Messiah is often thought of these days as a Christmas piece, it was quite rightly originally associated with Easter.

About this time, William Cavendish, 3rd Duke of Devonshire and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland invited Handel, already known as a charitable benefactor, to perform his music for the Dublin society, the proceeds to be shared between three charities. So it came about that the first performance of Messiah took place on 13 April 1742, in Neal's Music Hall on Fishamble Street near Dublin's Temple Bar district. Despite a disastrous rehearsal in Chester, where Handel was delayed on the way over to Ireland by bad weather, the performance was hugely successful and attended by 700 in a hall with a capacity of 600. The audience were asked to come without swords or hooped dresses, in order to maximise the seating. It was a number of years before Messiah was received as warmly in London.

The first London performance took place at the Covent Garden Theatre on 23rd March 1743, in the presence of King George II. When he heard the words, 'The Kingdom of this world...' from the 'Hallelujah' chorus, the King rose to his feet and remained standing until the end of the number. The exact reason the King stood at this point is lost to history, but as a matter of protocol, no-one could remain seated while the King was standing, so the whole audience and orchestra stood throughout.

This tradition remains favoured by some to this day. On a later occasion, when the composer Joseph Haydn heard the 'Hallelujah' chorus in Westminster Abbey, he exclaimed, with tears in his eyes, 'He is the master of us all'.

Handel conducted Messiah many times and often altered the music to suit the needs of the singers and orchestra he had available at the time of each performance. In consequence no single version can be regarded as definitive. Indeed Mozart revised and re-orchestrated it in 1788 for a series of performances in Vienna.

After Handel's death several mammoth commemorations were held in Westminster Abbey. These were huge occasions, employing up to 500 professional musicians. By the 1820's the oratorio had become the musical experience, with Messiah well in the lead. The regular festivals held in London, Birmingham, Leeds and other major cities were often a vehicle for the great oratorios. Many amateurs joined professional singers to form huge choruses. The Crystal Palace Handel Festivals began in 1857 and continued until 1926. These would have over 3000 performers and audiences would flock to them in their tens of thousands. But attitudes change and more recently there is a desire to get back to the 'authentic' scale and instrumentation of Handel's day which some see as more in keeping with the composer's original vision.

What is not in contention is the lasting appeal of the dramatic oratorio and Messiah in particular. The qualities which make it stand out are the richness and variety of the music and the ability to inspire such emotions as pathos, serenity and joy. It is a deeply satisfying work to perform, be the artists seasoned professionals or enthusiastic amateurs. There can be no doubt Messiah has made an enormous contribution over the last 250 years to expanding and popularising the appreciation and performance of classical music.

The Lancashire Chamber Orchestra

Leader Anne Heaton

The Lancashire Chamber Orchestra was formed in 1969. As the Lancashire String Orchestra it began life with few players, but has developed over the years into the much larger chamber orchestra of today. Its principal conductors have included Andrew Penny, Richard Vardigans Robert Chasey, and for eight years from 2004 the young American conductor Kenneth Woods, who introduced new, challenging and very diverse programmes often with rarely performed works. Outstanding among these were many Mozart Haydn and especially Beethoven symphonies, works by Schumann, Schubert and Britten, the first UK performance of the violin concerto by Hans Gal, and he regularly introduced players and audiences to a rich seam of 20th century masterpieces. Since his departure in 2012 the orchestra has enjoyed highly successful concerts under the direction of Richard Davis, Jon Malaxetxebarria Michael Bawtree, and Justin Doyle, and its much cherished and long tradition of including in its programmes new and often rarely heard works has continued. The current season has included concerts under the direction of Justin Doyle, and Richard Davis, with choral concerts in Chesterfield St Marys, and the RNCM under Steven Roberts and in Blackburn cathedral under Tom Newall.

Many of the orchestra members are string teachers and they are joined by advanced and enthusiastic non-professional players, all of whom demonstrate a huge commitment to the orchestra's increasingly demanding schedule of rehearsals and concerts. Most concerts require wind, brass and percussion players and we are extremely fortunate in being able to call upon an excellent team in all these departments.

The Lancashire Chamber Orchestra's own self-promoted concerts take place at the Altrincham Girls Grammar School. and it has enjoyed working over many years with many choirs from the region including Blackburn Music Society Altrincham Choral Society and the Chesterfield Philharmonic Choir. The orchestra has in its more recent history performed at The Bridgewater Hall, BBC Studio 7, Blackburn Cathedral, Manchester Cathedral and the RNCM.
